One account in 2006 suggested the dating scene in Beijing to be "sad" with particular difficulties for foreign women hoping to find romance. [86] It was reportedly due to the cold, uninterested, or unappealing attitudes of the male expats and the shyness and cultural differences of the Chinese men, [86] and another account in 2010, though, suggested that some Chinese men preferred Western women, viewing them as less girlish and materialistic and also more independent and straightforward than Chinese women. [88] A 2016 survey of Chinese students abroad, however, imply there have been significant barriers to foreign dating, [89] and the intermarriage rate of Chinese women in Shanghai has been decreasing. [90] A new format of Internet "QQ" chat rooms is gaining ground against socalled "traditional dating agencies" in Changsha (Hunan Province); the QQ rooms have 20,000 members, and service is much less expensive than dating agencies which can charge 100 to 200 yuan ($13 to US$26) per introduction.[91] Internet dating, with computer-assisted matchmaking, is becoming more prevalent; one site supposedly has 23 million registered users.[92] Speed dating has come to Shanghai and other cities.[93][94] Worldwide online matchmakers have explored entering the Chinese market via partnerships or acquisitions.[95] Each year, November 11 has become an unofficial holiday[96] known as China's Singles' Day when singles are encouraged to make an extra effort to find a partner.[97] Worried parents of unmarried children often arrange dates for their offspring on this day as well as others.[97] Before the day approaches, thousands of college students and young workers post messages describing their plans for this day. ^ "Raw dater". ^ [1] Archived 2013-05-01 at the Wayback Machine Article ^ Monica O'Neal (February 27, 2014). For example, it is a common belief that heterosexual men often seek women based on beauty and youth.[44][45] Psychology researchers at the University of Michigan suggested that men prefer women who seem to be "malleable and awed", and prefer younger women with subordinate jobs such as secretaries and assistants and fact-checkers rather than executive-type women. [46] Online dating patterns suggest that men are less "choosy", seek younger women, and "cast a wide net". [23] In a similar vein, the stereotype for heterosexual women is that they seek well-educated men who are their age or older with high-paying jobs.[44] Evolutionary psychology suggests that "women are the choosier of the genders" since "reproduction is a much larger investment for women" who have "more to lose by making bad choices."[47] For example, some[who?] have noted that educated women in many countries including Italy and Russia, [citation needed] and the United States find it difficult to have a career as well as raise a family, prompting a number of writers to suggest how women should approach dating and how to time their careers and personal life. ^ "Life Goes on a Date Arranged by Statistics". People who met 20, 25 or 30 years ago were more likely to mention co-workers," he says, and people who met in the past 10 years "were less likely to mention co-workers. ?"". The problem is that men usually have one universal definition of what is attractive (and you need to fit that in order to be considered hot), far more than women do, .... ^ Shawn T. ^ Brian Alexander, NBC News, August 12, 2013, New study on 'hooking up' finds no sexual sea change, American Sociological Association, retrieved Aug. 10 July 2008. According to one report, there was a 10% chance of violence between students happening between a boyfriend and girlfriend, sometimes described as "intimate partner violence", over a 12-month period.[65] A 2004 estimate was that 20% of U.S. high school girls aged 14-18 were "hit, slapped, shoved or forced into sexual activity".[66] Violence while dating isn't limited to any one culture or group or religion, but remains an issue in different countries.[67] (It is usually the female who is the victim, but there have been cases where males have been hurt as well.) Sara McCorquodale suggests that women meeting strangers on dates meet initially in busy public places, share details of upcoming dates with friends or family so they know where they'll be and who they'll be with, avoid revealing one's surname or address, and conduct searches on them on the Internet prior to the date.[68] One advisor suggested: Don't leave drinks unattended; have an exit plan if things go badly; and ask a friend to call you on your cell phone an hour into the date to ask how it's going.[68] Technology Map showing the most popular social media applications, by country;

new country: for example, one Indian woman met a white American man while skiing, and married him, and the formerly "all-important relatives" were reduced to bystanders trying to influence things ineffectively.[105] Factors operating worldwide, such as increased affluence, the need for longer education, and greater mobility have lessened the appeal for arranged marriages, and these trends have affected criteria about which possible partners are acceptable, making it more likely that pairings will cross previously impenetrable barriers such as caste or ethnic background.[105] Indian Americans in the U.S. sometimes participate in Singles Meets organized by websites which happen about once a month, with 100 participants at each event; an organizer did not have firm statistics about the success rate leading to a long-term relationship but estimated about one in every ten members finds a partner through the site.[111] Dating websites are gaining ground in India. Facebook, Skype, WhatsApp, and other applications have made remote connections possible. Writer Lavina Melwani described a happy marriage which had been arranged by the bride's father, and noted that during the engagement, the woman was allowed to go out with him before they were married on only one occasion; the couple married and found happiness. encourage families to put people together, and discourage sexual experimentation as well as so-called serial courtship in which a prospective bride or groom dates but continually rejects possible partners, since the interests of the family are seen as more important than the romantic needs of the people marrying. [2] Indian writers, such as Mistry in his book Family Matters, sometimes depict arranged marriages as unhappy.[107] Writer Sarita Sarvate of India Currents thinks people calculate their "value" on the "Indian marriage market" according to measures such as family status, and that arranged marriages typically united spouses who often didn't love each other.[108] She suggested love was out of place in this world because it risked passion and "sordid" sexual liaisons.[108] Love, as she sees it, is "Waking up in the morning and thinking about someone."[108] Writer Jennifer Marshall described the wife in an arranged marriage as living in a world of solitude without much happiness, and feeling pressured by relatives to conceive a son so she wouldn't be considered as "barren" by her husband's family; in this sense, the arranged marriages are unlikely to disappear soon, commenting in his book review of Shoba Narayan's Monsoon Diary, which has a detailed
